The reef gleams dull-red through the blue water, and white and pale green patches show where sand has occupation of the unallotted places. It stood in a hollow some yards from a low gully, so protected that the insurance of holding-roots seemed, perhaps, superfluous. StateLibraryofSouthAustralia. One such—a soft-wooded tree which some call the "sunflower," Last Leaves From Dunk Island the natives "gin-gee"—lies not far away. Most were stripped of foliage, but slender branches and twigs stand out as an elaborate fretwork against the sombre hue of the battered and slowly recovering background. Let it be remembered that most of the crops in the primitive garden belong to cool, if not cold, climates, and that here—well within the tropics—in almost pure sand, in some spots hot enough at noon to blister the feet, no check has been sustained by plants usually associated with cloudy skies and dripping mists.

But for these superabundant buds, the woeful and distorted forest through which ears accustomed to the silence and the musical whisperings of a sheltered bay, the roar and burst of the breakers of a wind-forgotten sea suggested a confused mental picture—a blending of black and grey without form.
