According to Baumeister and Leary, much of what human beings do is done in service of belongingness. By being a part of this group, one has a better ability to self-regulate. Social exclusion is the most common cause of anxiety. Baumeister and Leary argue that much of the research on group bonds can be interpreted through the lens of belongingness. People belong like those that they think they can understand and who they think can understand. Memories of past rejection and imagining social rejection elicit negative emotions. A workplace functions better as a collective.
