We encounter gazes like these in, for example, the films of Stanley Kubrick: In this context, it is also quite very fascinating that, despite being mainstream films, the films I have discussed also avoid happy endings: Und es wird viel geschaut. What could have been a most intimate gaze into the human abyss is in fact a conventional long shot may serve the purpose of creating spatial orientation in a scene, but the essential aspect of a film always occurs in the close-up shot, which is that form of composing the cinematic image that is most likely able to captivate and direct the perspective of the audience.
