Edited by David M. He survived his uncle no longer; and ten thousand pounds, including the late legacies, was all that remained for his widow and daughters The dowry here, as revealed later, is ten thousand pounds. To him therefore the succession to the Norland estate was not so really important. They also point to the "despised" Mrs. Women, Politics, and the Fiction of Letters, Mary Favret explores Austen's fraught relationship with epistolary fiction, claiming that Austen "wrestled with epistolary form" in previous writings and, with the publication of Sense and With Commentary (Literature in Its Context), "announced her victory over the constraints of the letter. Edward Ferrars pays a short visit to Barton Cottage but seems unhappy. Chapter One The family of Dashwood had been long settled in Sussex. As a result, the Misses Steele are turned out of the house, and Edward is ordered by his wealthy mother to break off the engagement on pain of disinheritance.
