The strong claims made by the doctrine of human rights continue to provoke considerable scepticism and debates about the content, nature and justifications of human rights to this day. In an institution which has such relatively weak enforcement powers, this is perhaps seen as a problematic area which is best avoided. Were they not to do so, then the individuals in question would have no opportunity to exercise their rights "in community with other members of their group". Relativists do not argue against human rights, but concede that human rights. The right to security of the person, to a fair and public trial, to asylum from persecution, or to free elections, for example, manifestly cannot be assured without some affirmative government action.
