Men were identified as being active, moral and rational and domineering, whereas women were viewed as being naturally inferior to men, subordinate, immoral and irrational. Their oppression was rooted in the patriarchal system of their society whose all public spheres were closed to. It evaluates the roles of women in their societies and stresses their social conditions, as well as their state of subordination. One especially feel this while looking at the vast, dark, almost black paint The wings of the angel, Dmitri writes, had a butterfly-like
